Researchers from Dalhousie University and Cape Breton University completed a qualitative feminist and phenomenological study supported by the Canadian Institutes of Health Research (CIHR) and the Nova Scotia Health Research Foundation (NSHRF), with partnership funding from the Nursing Research Fund (NRF) from Dalhousie's School of Nursing and the Faculty of Health Professions to better understand Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Queer (LGBQ+) women's health and health care experiences during birth across rural Nova Scotia. The following offers a summarized report of the findings from the women's stories and an overview of the implications for education, practice and policy.

The team acknowledges with profound appreciation the courageous women who so generously shared their birthing stories to make this research possible.
